Virginia Lee's Personal Answers To Herald Readers' Questions

It seems that the majority of the men and boys of today do not realize to what extent they are under social obligations to the femi-

It is generally the girl who is the hostess at the little parties such as dinners, dances, teas, etc., but many a modern young man who wouldn't think of missing such an affair attends much the same as if he had paid admission to some charity ball with all obligations at an end. It seems impossible, but many young men are so thoughtless as to attend a party given by a young lady in their set without once asking her for a dance. Equally as rude is the boy who fails to help the hostess entertain any of her outof-town guests. Such little acts of thoughtfulness which are in reality tundamentals of social courtesy are more than appre-

Of course, it is not possible as a general thing for young men, especially those no longer dependent on "dad" and struggling to make both ends meet with their promising positions to entertain extensively. Neither is this expected, but in the weekly theater trips, dinner parties and other informal affairs a young man should include as guests those girls to whom he is under obligation. Likewise she should receive a call from him before many days have elapsed.

The young man who accepts all and offers nothing will soon lose in popularity while the extremely agreeable, thoughtful man, though possessing less of this world's goods, will never fail to be in demand.

Miss Carroll has some ideas of her own about the foreign trade situation which she is going to put into effect.
